The President's Desk

The world's most important worktable reflects an average American man

AMERICAN EXECUTIVES, the most desk-minded in the world, have never been able to agree what, if anything, belongs on top of their worktables. Sturdily devoted to the belief that the desk reflects the man, they have either kept their self-consciously businesslike, or interested-then-As an extrovert frenzy with radars, zippers, knives and molotovs.

Most important desks in the nation, and in one way or another influencing desk-owners everywhere, in a time when fire-scared, repainted seven-footer that has served every President with the exception of F.D.R. since the days of Teddy Roosevelt.

If the desk reflects the man, President Truman is a sentimentalist, family man, patriot, joiner, clock-watcher, and automaton with enough frugal practicality to make him cherish the give-away calendar handed out by business firms.

Placed in orderly rows around his desk are such disparate items as a lotus pole, telephone, four clocks (out of six in the room), two American flags, a picture of his wife, a gold Shriners' membership plaque, an autographed note by Mark Twain ("Always do right. The only way to gratify some people and annoy the rest is to be a pole of granite from Mt. McKinley, a vase of flowers, a dog donkey, five calendars (one for last year), an appointment pad, scissors, paper, a ruler, two barometers, a thermometer, lamp, three fountain pen sets, two ink bottles (one with white ink), a date stamp, a buttoned water bottle, an engagement schedule, and two books bound "Staff" and "Cabinet." A bench at the back holds a radio, and a table holds the overflow of his desk, mostly family photographs.

Of all the most interesting is the battered old ice-water vacuum pitcher, which belonged to F.D.R. The new President sentimentally asked to keep when all other F.D.R. personal effects were sent to Hyde Park for safekeeping. It's a tie with the past "Neat, cluttered, but not gaudy" seems guiding principle of Truman's desk. F.D.R. had more personal items, including stamp album.

Opposite desk is Washington portrait. Globe was used by Gen. Eisenhower in war.

Table behind President's desk bears pictures of his mother, Mrs. Truman and daughter Margaret, also water bottle and Army radio.
