

THE WAR FRONTS

ITALY: The thunderous chorus of hundreds of Allied guns from Cassino to the Tyrrhenian Sea and from Allied warships offshore opened the new offensive in Italy at 2300 hours 11 May. The heavy bombardment was followed immediately by a large scale attack by Allied tanks and infantry.

In preparation, the bulk of the Eighth Army had been shifted to western Italy where it took over the Cassino sector, while troops of the Fifth Army that had been fighting there moved to the left and went into action in the Garigliano River area. The action progressed with the lineup as follows—Americans were on the coastal flank, French troops were on their right north of Castelforte, and still farther north British troops bridged the Rapido River and also made a frontal assault on Cassino. A British salient to the north and west of Cassino was threatening to cut the Via Casilina which feeds German units still in Cassino.

Capture of Castelforte opened the gateway for the Allies to the Liri Valley and French troops of the Fifth Army were credited with making a significant breach in the Gustav line when they pressed forward in the mountains with infantry and tanks, taking the villages of San Ambrogio, Valle Maio and Ausonia. Thus the road between Cassino and Formia which connects the main highways of the Via Casilina with the Via Appia were cut. To the south, the French-American troops advanced to take Spigno and cut the same road between Ausonia and Formia.

Official reports stated that the Allied gains were swifter and their losses smaller than had been anticipated. This was despite determined enemy resistance from the strongly prepared positions of the Gustav line.

Effective naval cooperation was being given the Fifth Army's left flank, and Allied vessels bombarded enemy positions and batteries in the area around Formia and Itri. There was considerable air activity, much of it in direct tactical support of the ground advance. Allied planes hit industrial targets in the Po Valley, ports and rail points supporting the German positions in central Italy. The number of sorties recorded one day exceeded 2800.
